As I was rewatching Techno content for research purposes I threw together a very humble design for my website using Canva. Though I felt like expanding it further would be a waste of time.

I planned from the beginning to have some kind of video on the home page. The video you see looping on the home page was edited by me. I recorded those Techno moments and pieced them together.

About the Sun Tzu quote on top of the video, Techno often makes references from the Art of War in his videos so I wanted to do the same. I actually went through The Art of War to find a quote that describes him well.

I was originally going to use some really unhinged color palette consisting of pink, red, white, yellow, black and green. But I realized that's too much after visiting Techno's official website. This website uses a simple red, black, white color palette which I decided would suit my website as well. I got the same fonts for the h1, h2 and p elements as his website as well. Though for my navbar I'm using the Spartan font family from The Daily Sponge worksheets.

I used Techno's website, this one and The Daily Sponge as inspiration. You've probably noticed a lot of similarities with the worksheets we had to do. In my defense that's from where I learned how to do most of this designing stuff.

My whole mentality when I was building this website was "I need to convey Techno's spirit to new potential fans who maybe don't know who he was", which is what motivated me to include so many embedded videos. In my opinion this was the best way to familiarize you with The Blade.

The home page introduces you with stories from his childhood which I noticed neither Wikipedia or Wikitupia had included so I did. They are actually from the 3 hour video commemorating his channel hitting 20mil subscribers. The video was uploaded by his father and it was very bitter sweet.

I initially made a txt file where I would write my plans for the website and any content I wanted to include but later I uploaded it to my drive  CSWD Hero Assignment . I've allowed anyone with the link to edit it so you'd be able to see past versions of the file and how frequently I made additions/edits.
